FOR QUESTIONS 41 TO 45, READ THE PASSAGE AND ANSWER THE QUESTIONS THAT FOLLOW.

Julie was a young girl of mixed origin, born to an Indian mother and an Australian father. She grew up in an aboriginal community that was in the Gulf of Carpentaria. It was extremely isolated when compared to a town. They had running water but there wasn't a proper sewage system. Housing and overcrowding were the worst problems. Nutrition and health were in an equally bad state. They had one shop, but they didn't have fresh vegetables, etc. They had much more fish than meat as their community was right in the ocean.

Julie's father is a white Australian from Tasmania. He sent Julie away to a boarding school that he thought was the best in the southern part of Australia. She was luckier than her friends were, because unfortunately in her community, many kids were illiterate.

The boarding school was mixed with lots of different kids – most of them were from even more isolated regions than Julie's was.

Many children came from the farmer families and there were several international children too. It was an adjustment for Julie. She used to be embarrassed to tell people where she was from because her community was considered to be one of the least civilized.

After Julie completed school, she took charge of her own life and travelled widely. She went and lived in Perth, Sydney, Adelaide and even in the Northern territory. She then packed up travelled around the world. This experience made Julie realize that she was very lucky – she belonged to two worlds – she was from a backward community, but she also relished the modern comforts and pleasures of life.

Julie's greatest desire was to study medicine and become a doctor. The basic living conditions were terrible in indigenous communities – no better than in most Third-World countries. She wanted to help change that condition. She would love to be a doctor on the move. As a kid, she used to watch that whenever there was an emergency in the community – like an accident or any other critical medical condition, planes would land on the grass airstrips and they would take the person away in no time. She was most interested in Third-World medicine. One of her biggest and most consuming passions was herbal medicines. With her western knowledge, she'd really like to bring back the natural remedies that indigenous people have used for so many years. Some of them are just as good as any modern chemical medicines.

Rachna and Preeti were always trying to get the better of each other. One day, in October, Preeti saw a mango growing on her tree. She knocked it down, wrapped it in a cloth and waited for Rachna to come by.

When she did, Preeti called out to her. "I have a riddle for you," she said. "Can you tell me what fruit is wrapped in this cloth?"

If you guess correctly, you may take any one thing from my house that you can carry out with your two hands. However, if you fail I'll come to your house and carry away something."

"All right," said Rachna, always ready to match her wits with Preeti. "It must be a guava."

"No," said the other woman, "I'll give you two more guesses."

"It is the season for custard apples," said Rachna, "It must be a custard apple."

"Last guess." "Pomegranate?" she said.

"You've failed," said Preeti and triumphantly uncovered the mango.

"I'll go home and prepare for your visit," said Rachna, "Come in half an hour." Thirty minutes later, Preeti was at the gate of Rachna's house.

A glint of metal caught her eye and looking up she saw there was a chest on the roof. "Tell me truthfully," she said to Rachna, "Does that chest contain anything valuable?"

"Yes," said Rachna, "All our money and most of my ornaments. I thought I had concealed it well."

"You should've covered it," said Preeti, gleefully, "Now though it is outside your house it is still part of your house and I can claim it."

"You have to lay your hands on it first. Remember, you may take only one thing from my house."

"One is enough," said Preeti. She went boldly into Rachna's house, brought out a ladder and placed it against the roof. "Yes, kindly take it down for me," said Rachna, "and I must thank you for sparing my valuables."

"Sparing your valuables?" said Preeti, perplexed. "What makes you think I'm going to let you keep your valuables?"
